On the evening of the fame day, a let-ter was lent by these men to the Casse de Foi, in the Palais Royal, the rendezvous of the friends to liberty, fating the circumstances, and calling on them for ai-fiftance, their lives being in imminent danger, on ac-count of the patriotic conduct the regiment had dis-played the other day, when called upon to fire on their countrymen!

This letter was instantly read aloud, and produced an immediate effect. An immenie multitude of per-fons of all ranks fet out from the Palais Royal at fe-ten o'clock, and were in the Palais Royal at fe-ten o'clock, and were a great number of French way, among whom were a great number of French guards, and having procured inftruments from finiths, carpenters, &c. as they went along, proceeded to the Abbaye St Germain, where, in an hour's time, they forced open all the gates and bolts, and releated the priloners. Mean while, troops of dragoons and huffars were fent for; but on arriving, they likewife fheathed their fabres, drank with the multitude, and aided rather than molefted them, joining in their recommendations. &c.

Mr Sheridan moved, "That the bill for regulating the Royal Burghs in Scotland be read a fecond time," which being done,
Mr Sheridan then urged the commitment of the bill, by moving, "That the Speaker do now leave the Cair."

Sir James Johnstone opposed it, upon the princi-ple of avoiding dangerous innovation; it would be destructive to entails, it would also alter the mode of trial a law, and might perhaps overturn the whole confliction of Scotland. He did not with haftily to alter the law of Scotland, for, as it now stands, a man has a chance of out-living a law-fuit.

Mr Sheridan then entered into the principle of the

Mr Sheridan then entered into the principle of the bill; r had, on a former occasion, he said, been urged, that in point of fact no grievances exist in the Royal Boroughs in Scotland; he afferted that grievances did exist, and therefore they were at issue upon that fact, and the only way to decide the difference was, by referring the decision to the Committee. Mr Sheridan said, that his plan was, to disfuse, as much as possible, the principle of civil liberty in Scotland, and it was with that view he had framed the present bill.

There were in Scotland fixty-six Royal Boroughs, fifty-two of which concur in the plan which he now submitted to the House; he might, perhaps, be asked, why none of the Members of the Convention of Delegates complained,—to this there was a very plain and gates complained,—to this there was a very plain and obvious answer, viz. that it was not to be expected that those who practise abuse should complain of their practice; but to prove the fact of the existing evils, upwards of nine thousand persons had signed a petition, praying relief against the evils. Mr Sheridan then enumerated the circumstances of which companies the circumstances of the case of the circumstances of the circum then enumerated the circumstances of which com-plaint was made. The Town-Councils were felf-elected, nor was there any remedy against their proceedings; for there was no Court before whom their conduct could be arraigned; it was therefore evident, that they possesses it was therefore evident, that they possesses it was no argument to fay, that these powers were never abused; it was enough to allow that such power existed; for the end of all found policy was, that there should not exist, in any human tribunal, a power to entereif with impunity man events to be expected, that arbitrary power will fometimes be opprefively used; and indeed, he would fairly admit he would rather it were so than other-wise, lest a single exception might put mankind off their guard against it.

Mr Sheridan, in illustrating his principles, read se veral extracts from different entries, tending to prove that neither the Lords of Soffion, or the Court of Exchequer, had any power to reverse the orders of the Town-Council, and it would be rather curious to recur to the Committee of Delegates, because that would be referring to the delinquents to reverse their own malversation. Mr Sheridan then observed, that if a Committee was allowed upon this bill, the further discussion might be put off until the next session and different gentlemen. and different gentlement publications, which had been written on both fides; as to himfelf, he thought those publications, which had been written on one fide wholly unariwerable, but others might be of a different apprion; all he wanted was, that the principles of treedom flould prevail in every part of the kingdom.

Mr Dandes entered at large into the arguments of Mr Sheridan; he did not fee any reason why the House should affent to the simple proposition of any individual, however splendid his abilities.

Mr Dandas then urged, that it was pretty fingular that none of the Members for Scotland complained of all these evils; they surely, from their filence, must have entered into a confederacy against the people; the affect withed it to be remembered that the Constitution he also wished it to be remembered that the tution of Scotland was not now more defective than it has been for 400 years past. He then adverted to what had been faid by Mr Sheridan on the point of poop persons having signed the petition. This, he persons having signed the petition. This, he said, was not wonderful; for, if a proposition was made to make the office of Alderman of London an made, instead of being for the hand on doubt but the proposition and limited thouland persons would subscribe to the proposition, and limited the proposition and limited the person would subscribe to the proposition and limited the proposition. to the proposition, and sign a perions would haberned to the proposition, and sign a perion to effect it; to they would, perhaps, propose that which was to give them the right to elect a Chancellor or King. He then insisted on the right of the charter being confidered inviolate, as it came from the Crown; and Mr Sheridan, he faid, aimed in a moment, and with one blow, to annihilate the whoie fabric. He also contended, that it was part of the Articles of Union, that the Royal Boroughs should for ever remain as they then were. He laid, that this plan of reformation a-rose from the disposition and principles softered by one Zeno, and other ingenious reformers, at the time of the motion for a reform in the representation of the people in Parliament. He then took notice of the confusion always attendant on a General Election.—
He did not wish to say much on that point, because it was a delicate subject; and the good things attend-ing it, perhaps, might compensate for the trouble and ing it, perhaps, might compensate for the trouble and dishculty with which it was accompanied. But this annual election, which the system now proposed would openson, must produce idleness, anarchy, coraption, and debauchery. He contended, that it was a doctrine which no monarchy, however limited, could possibly tolerate, that the people should be allowed to chuse those persons who have a right to exercise authority over them. The case might be different in chusing Representatives. He urged also, that it was not fair to imply delinquency for the purpose of introducing a project of Resorm. The delinquency should first be proved; and the regular way to do so was, to move for a Committee to enquire into abuses, and then move for leave to bring in a bill to prevent those abuses, and remove the evils. He into abutes, and then move for leave to bring in a bill to prevent those abuses, and remove the evils. He also observed, that it was impossible that Mr Sheridan could be serious in pressing this business at so late a period of the session. He rather thought it an aim at popularity; but he advised some other method to obtain that, for Mr Sheridan would never have a statue tain that, for Mr Sheridan would never have a statue erected to perpetuate his memory in Scotland, for his endeavours to reform the Royal Boroughs.

All Anstruker opposed the bill.

Six Jesph Manuber remarked, that though Mr Dunglas had insided so strongly on the necessary of a previous Committee, yet when the Minister had introduced his measure of the Parliamentary Reform, no such Committee had been mentioned, but the facts no fuch Committee had been mentioned, but the facts were taken for granted. He argued, that to try the

In such a case, he ly would not condemn each other. In such a case, thought that the Articles of Union should not the

Mr Sheridan said, that the bill itself, and the perfon who had the honour of introducing it, had been pictured as a immediate and a temporary popularity. withing that his efforts may be compeniated by the erection of a feature! He could afture the kight Hon. Gentleman, (Mr Dundas), that fuch was not his purpofe, nor his hope. He truited that his motives would be taken from his own statement. He wished merely to diffuse the bleffings of civil liberty to a part of this island, where unfortunately they were not known to their full extent. It was a case of oppress. fion, and fuch would, in all inftances, demand all the aid which he could befow. If the Minister of Scotland, he added, in his summer vitus to that kingdom, paid a little more attention to these subjects, little less to parliamentary jobbery, perhaps his chance for a statue would not be very greatly diminished !

It had been faid, that he could not be ferious in this business, from his bringing in the bill at 6 late a period of the session! This was an objection which. leaft of all others, he had expected to hear; for, if it was valid, then the Minister could not be serious in the very important business now before the House, and which stood precisely in the same predicament. The Excise on tobacco was an instance, which hoped, it was not the serious intention of the Mi to carry any farther in the course of the present fol

A fuggestion had been thrown out by Mr Day as if this proceeding had its origin in the rage for parliamentary reform, and which had been follered in pamphlets and other publications by one Zeno, and other ingenious gentlemen. But from this praife and other ingenious gentlemen. But from this prate it was rather uncandid to exclude two other very ingenious reformers—William Pitt and the Duke of Richmond, who had both fostered that same zeal with an uncommon degree of assiduity! It looked with an incommon eagree or antunty in more also like an oblique imputation on the former of thesa gentlemen, when, it was faid, that he (Mr Sheridan) was not serious in his plan of reform, as the Right Hon. Gentleman, being in the confidence of the Minister, may appear to judge from his conduct on his plan of reform, what were the intentions of o-

It was a matter of furprize to find, that the Right Hon. Gentleman who now infilted on the necessary of a previous Committee, had not made the fame objection on the motion for the first reading, when it would have come with more propriety! It was strange also that he should appear ignorant of the effects which had been produced by his own charter for restanding the Bernard of Striking. He could have gulating the Borough of Stirling!—He could, how-ever, inform that Right Hon. Gentleman of two very material facts:—In the first place, that the people of Stirling had experienced a material benefit from their Stirling had experienced a material benefit from their new charter; and, in the second, that this charter differed but in a few shades from that, which by the present bill it was proposed to extend.—It was not the purpose of this to overturn the present charters, but to restore the ancientusage. With respect to the immorality attendant on elections, it might perhaps be the wish of that gentleman, that the intervening periods should be as long as possible, but this was no argument against their necessity. The election of the Actionals Was now annual, to make that of the Merchant Councillors the same could be foreign with Merchant Counfellors the fame, could be fraught with little additional danger or inconvenience.

He would, however, accede in part to the propo-fition of the Right Hon. Gentleman; he was aware of the inconvenience which must arise from the pro-fecution of this enquiry. He should, therefore, defer the measure to the next selfion, when it should er-tainly be introduced to a previous Committee, and the facts substantiated in the manner which had been required.

Mr Martin spoke in favour of the bill. Sir Thomas Dundas afferted the necessity of the Reform; but as the bill was to be postponed, he referved his arguments for another occasion.

The question was then put on the committal of the bill, and negatived without a division.

Mr Stone and Mr Harrison were then called in as reidence in support of the bill, and having been examined until eleven o'clock, they withdrew.

Sir Warkin Leaves immediately rose for the purpose of patting an end to the bill, by moving for the Chairman's leaving the chair. He entered at lengthin-to ageneral reproduction of the bill, not only as being in its principle destructive to the liberties of Englishmen, but in its regulations so particularly oppressive upon the tobacco manufacturers, as to render it impossible, if the bill should be carried into a law, for them to proceed in their business. He moved, "That the Chairman leave the chair."

Chairman leave the chair."

Mr Dundar remarked on the stage of the business in which the worthy Alderman had thought proper to make a motion with intent of putting an end to the bill. He could neither consider it to be caudid or fair. He ought to have let the Committee at least go into a discussion of the clauses, when, if the bill was found to be objectionable, a motion to get rid of it would come with much more propriety than at present.

Mr S. Smith declared himself in support of the motion. It was impossible, he said, for the bill to be

He could not conceive what were the reasons which induced the worthy Aldermanto move, and the Hon. In postponing it to mother selbon, no evil confequences whatever could not. He said, instead of the present motion being mend prepositerous, the time in which the bill was mought in more justly merited that appellation; it ad, however, been the practice of the last four tars, to bring in measures of the greatest importance the end of a session, the reason for which, he said, high best be concluded from an observation of the loase, at a late period of the Session, when they would find country gentlemen in general absent, and at Treasury Bench always ready with a formidable amber. He declared that it would be impossible for a bill to be got shrough with for several months, as bill to be get through with for feveral months, as s, each of which, he faid, would be debated as ob-

The Duke d'Orleans played a politic as well as a popular game in leaning to the Third Estate: it ever the claim of succession to the throne of France came to be disjusted between his Highness and the present King of Spain, which is far from improbable, the interest of the French commonalty will be found of great weight in the contest.

The King of Spain's lare protest against any proceeding of the States General that may affect his claim to the inheritance of the Crown of France by descent, has caused a sudden coolness between the Courts of Versailles and Madrid.

The French nobility are still far from appeased, and seemed determined to oppose, by force of arms, the usurpations of the Commons. They are making strong appeals to the army to join them in vindicating their antient rights and unsulfied honour.

The news received on Saturday night, by express antient rights and unfullied honour.

The news received on Saturday night, by expression the Duke of Dorfet, is faid to be, that M. Necker has incurred the King's difpleature for having advised him to abandon the resolutions he had taken; and that his Majesty has appointed Marshal Broglio Generalistino of his forces; a circumstance very unufual in time of peace. The inference deduced from this is, that his Majesty will use his utmost efforts to introduce a change in the present state of his kingdom. Thirty thousand troops are marching from Loraine to Paris, which, with those in the vicinity, are to form a camp of 50,000 men. From many Lorane to Faris, which, with those in the result, are to form a camp of 50,000 men. From many concurrent circumstances, there is indeed reason to believe, that the freedom of France, if ever it is established, will not be so easily effected as was generally supposed. This morning a messenger arrived at the Secretary of State's office, with letters from his Majesty, at Weymouth, by which we were informed of his Majesty's perfect state of health.

"House of Commons, July 6. 1789.

"There was a debate on Reform of above two hours, in which Mr Sheridan made a very admirable speech. It is now one-half past seven. "The Captain describes his situation as very unhappy during the voyage, the convicts being always on the catch to gain their ends, which were to murder him and his crew, two men excepted, who they were to reserve for the purpose of navigating the ship to some unfrequented harbour, where they expected to make their escape. They had so far effected their purpose on the 2d inst. that most part of them either cut their irons, or took their wrists out of them, with the loss of the skin of the back of their hands. The Captain, however, got five of the ringleaders made fast to an anchor, and thought himself under the necessary of puring in here on account of their conduct. On his applying to the Admiral for help round to Plymouth, the Southampton frigate was ordered to nattend him, which, he says, gave him great peace of mind." Indeed, it is wonderful such a parcel of sellows should have been fent a coasting voyage, without a sufficient guard to protect the failors who navigated the ship, who might say with the Latin poet.
